Joseph A. Spitzig, PhD

Philosophy Curriculum

The courses I took as a part of my Bachelor of Arts program in Philosophy include the following:

- Introduction to Philosophy
- Elementary Logic & Semantics
- Symbolic Logic
- Ancient Philosophy
- History of Classical & Medieval Philosophy
- Modern Philosophy & the Problem of Truth
- Philosophy of Religion
- Philosophy of Science
- Philosophy & Journalism
- Business Ethics
- Math Analysis I & II
- Introduction to Statistical Methods
- Introduction to Psychology
- Social Psychology
- Psychology of Perception
- Introduction to Cultural Anthropology
- Principles of Economics
- History of the United States to 1865
- Basic Principles of Speech Communication
- Advanced College Writing
- Introduction to Mass Communication
- Writing for Mass Media
- World Literature I
- Fundamentals of Design

At the time I entered the University of Maryland as a young man, I thought that a degree in Philosophy would be an excellent preparation for entering the seminary at the graduate level and being ordained a Catholic priest. The more I saw how intellectually corrupt the contemporary teaching of Philosophy was, however, the more disenchanted I became with the discipline, and I discontinued my studies.

Years later, I returned to school and took the few remaining courses required to complete the Philosophy degree along with a Bachelor of Science in Industrial Education. In the interim, however, I had read extensively and discovered to the restoration of my sanity that there really is such a thing as sound Philosophy: Epistemological Realism. My advice is to stick with Aristotle and Aquinas and disregard all those sophistic poseurs who would lead you into various flavors of Radical Subjectivism.

My Website